In company with a traveling man, whom she met on a train from Knoxville to Washington, Miss Rucker came here from Washington. The couple registered as man and wife. He was a handsome man of about thirty years; she a pretty blonde of twenty-five.

On Tuesday night they went to the Bijou, and on Wednesday the sights of the city were taken in. Again, on Wednesday night, the couple went to the Bijou. In the hotel the clerks and attendants noticed the apparent affection that existed between the two, for the woman never lost sight of the man, even when he went into the office to look after his mail. Early yesterday morning the young man left his room, and a short while af terward Detective Gibson and men were summoned to the hotel.

The young woman then told her story. She said she had lost a valuable diamond ring and a sum of money, and she charged the young man with having carried them off. She said he took her ring that morning, and said he was going to a jeweler's to get a stud just like it for himself. He went away, and in a short while a messenger came with a note from him, in which he said he was going away. Accompanying the note was a $10 note, which, he said, would carry her back to New York.

Inquiry revealed the fact that her board at the Lexington had been paid up to supper time last night.

The detectives went to work at once on the case. They visited all the pawn shops and the jewelry stores, but could find no clue to the missing ring. 'They also sent telegrams to various cities, asking the police to keep a look-out for the man. They found several people who had seen the two together, and who were able to identify the man, should he be apprehended. Miss Rucker was anxious to return to

New York. She had only the $10 she said had been sent her by the man, which was just enough to pay for a ticket to New York. There was nothing for incidentals, and she said she felt that she should take the first train for
